The space shuttle Endeavor took Zuni Fetishes into space as a form of protection in 1994. As of 2014 there were an estimated 300-600 known Zuni carvers. Zuni beliefs say that the Fetish chooses the owner, not vice-versa.

An excellent guidebook of the wide variety of Zuni fetishes carvings available today. McManis goes into some painstaking detail of Zuni cosmology in the introduction, then gives details on each of the animals that are frequently carved now in Zuni, and finishes the slim volume with a discussion of four Zuni carving families accompanied by ...

The Zuni believe that animals are closer to their deities than humans are (and therefore more powerful) and that their powers are present within their fetishes. While each animal represents something different it can represent anything its owner wishes it to. It might be carried in a medicine pouch or housed in a traditional 'fetish bowl' within the home.

Zuni fetishes, known to the Shiwí people as wemawe, are small stone animal carvings that are made by the talented artisans of Zuni Pueblo. Zuni Pueblo is located in the northwest corner of New Mexico, (near the "Four Corners" region of the US of A.)

The small carvings made by the Zuni people are quite captivating and very collectable. People buy them for a number of reasons. They are usually in the likeness of animals, often with a colorful decoration of beads or shell that may be referred to as a "power bundle". Some people feel that fetishes have healing or other properties.
